In his works, he calls on young people to strive for Enlightenment, science and culture. Avlani also values the historical and cultural heritage of his people and calls for its preservation. Through his works, the ideas of the spiritual rise of his people, the pursuit of Science and culture are reflected. As a person known for his enlightenment ideals, he saw education and upbringing as an integral part of human life. He saw education not only as a process of learning, but also as an important means of maturing a person, serving his spiritual and moral rise. In his works, avlonius extensively highlights the importance of education and upbringing, encouraging the younger generation to strive for science, to realize their identity, and to achieve high spirituality. Avlani argues that in the educational process it is necessary not only to give theoretical knowledge, but also to develop practical skills. In his works, he considers it important to develop the versatility of education, that is, the ability of a person to think, creativity and moral qualities.[2]

Education, in his opinion, should make a person not only a knowledgeable, but also a morally full-fledged person. Avlani also advances ideas of self-discipline, independent thinking, and achieving one's own goals in the educational process. Speaking about the importance of education and upbringing, Avlani also emphasizes the preservation of national values and traditions in his works. understands that the future of his nation depends on educated and enlightened people, and therefore places great emphasis on education. In his works he advances values such as national pride, patriotism and humanity. Avlony argues that education is not limited only to the knowledge given at school, but that life experiences also play an important role in the educational process. He shows that a person can learn a lot from his life experiences, from the process of solving problems. Avlony also considers it important in his works to be self-educated and constantly renewing his knowledge. He encourages a person to constantly work on himself, to master new knowledge and skills. The role of parents and teachers is also important in raising the younger generation. Avlony, in his works, emphasizes the responsibility of parents to educate their children.[3]

He recommends that parents encourage their children to pursue science, enlightenment, to educate them well, and to teach the values of their people. Teachers, on the other hand, play an important role in bringing their knowledge and experiences to the younger generation, according to Avlony. He emphasizes the need for teachers to work on themselves, renew their knowledge, and educate their students well. Avlony also pays attention to the development of creativity in the educational process. In his works, he encourages young people to think creatively, express their ideas and create something new. This, in his opinion, is one of the main goals of Education. In the educational process, a creative approach, the opportunity to freely express their thoughts develop young people and contribute to their maturation as individuals. It also emphasizes the social importance of education and upbringing. It shows that educated people play an important role in the development of society, and that the role of education in ensuring social justice and equality is unparalleled. In his writings, avlony argues for the need to foster moral values such as friendship, solidarity, and helping one another through education. He also points out ways to promote social stability in society and address social problems through education.[4]
